The Resume Writing Guide

How to turn your template into a resume that actually gets read — structure, summaries, and bullets that land interviews.

01

Before You Start

A resume has one job: get you the interview. It doesn't need to tell your whole story — it needs to prove, in under 30 seconds of skimming, that you can do the job in front of a hiring manager.

Before you fill in a single field, gather three things:

- The job posting you're applying to, with the key requirements highlighted
- A rough list of your last 5–10 years of roles, with dates
- Two or three numbers that show your impact (revenue, time saved, people managed, error rate reduced — anything measurable)

TIP

If you only remember one rule from this guide: every resume should be tailored to the job posting in front of you. A resume tuned for one role beats a generic one every time.

02

Structuring the Page

Your template is already ordered the way hiring managers expect to read it: contact info, professional summary, experience, education, and supporting sections. Keep that order — don't reinvent the layout.

LENGTH

- Under 10 years of experience: one page, no exceptions
- 10+ years or senior/executive roles: two pages maximum
- Cut older roles (15+ years back) down to a single line — title, company, dates

WHAT TO CUT FIRST

If you're over the page limit, cut in this order: bullets that don't relate to the job you want, your oldest role's detail, and any skill or software you haven't touched in five years.

03

Writing the Professional Summary

Three to four sentences, no more. Open with your title and years of experience, then the scope of what you handle, then one proof point.

EXAMPLE

Healthcare professional with 7+ years across clinical and administrative roles. Oversees a caseload/team of 200+ while leading intake process improvements that cut average wait time by 25%. Known for calm, clear communication under pressure and a track record of mentoring staff — equally at home leading a care team or a department.

Skip the objective statement ("Seeking a challenging role where I can grow..."). Hiring managers want to know what you offer, not what you're hoping to get out of it.

Writing Bullets That Get Read

Every bullet should follow the same shape: action verb, what you did, and the result — with a number whenever you can find one.

EXAMPLE

"Responsible for onboarding new hires" becomes "Redesigned the onboarding program, cutting new-hire ramp-up time from 6 weeks to 3."

STRONG OPENING VERBS

Led, built, launched, reduced, increased, redesigned, negotiated, streamlined, trained, resolved.

AVOID

- "Responsible for..." — describes the job, not your impact
- Vague adjectives with no evidence ("hard-working," "team player") unless backed by a specific example
- Listing duties instead of outcomes

TIP

Aim for at least one quantified bullet per role. If you genuinely can't find a number, quantify scope instead — team size, budget, caseload, ticket volume.

Final Checklist

- Every bullet ties back to a skill or requirement in the job posting
- Dates are consistent in format throughout (Month Year – Month Year)
- No first-person pronouns ("I," "my")
- Spell-checked, and read once out loud — typos hide from silent reading
- Saved as a PDF for applying, with your name in the file name (e.g., AnnaWilliams_Resume.pdf)
- A second person has read it, if possible
